Globalization and Its Critics

Professor Irving Leonard Markovitz
Fall 2013

Did “globalization” cause the Arab Spring? Are the internet, texting, Facebook and Google the major new forces for democracy in the developing world? Were the credit default swaps, sub-prime mortgages, and derivatives based on the new institutions of global capitalism, responsible for the near descent into depression of 2008?

First-wave writers about globalization offered a bewildering array of answers to questions such as: What is “Globalization?” Who benefits? Are there “victims?” Can it be stopped? A second wave of intellectuals has gone beyond these questions to better understand the enduring structures, institutions and processes of a new global era. Spurred in part by the deepest global downturn since the “great depression,” a new set of scholars now asks with renewed fervor if the processes of globalization are reversible, if we are in a phase of “de-globalization,” and if we are in a terrifyingly intensified period of growing inequality.

This seminar will inquire into whether globalization is simply another name for historical trends of long duration, interdependence, internationalization, imperialism, neo or post-imperialism, or something qualitatively new. Does globalization advance “real” democracy, or “lite” democracy, which like “lite beer” looks and smells like beer but has no body and is a shadow of the real thing? Is it true that globalization means that the conditions of life of most people in the world will worsen, not improve in our lifetimes? Why is it that “democratization” does not necessarily mean less inequality? What has happened to the promise of “civil society”? What are the paradoxes of Neo-Liberalism? We will examine studies that see globalization as the construction of diverse forms of network power; as new institutions of democratization that come from “the globalization of accountability”; and as a new form of capitalism that has produced more goods and services than any previous economic system of production and yet has great difficulties overcoming crisis of financial instability and of equitable distribution.

Objectives:

1. To critically evaluate contending conceptions of globalization.
2. To examine causative connections between the forces of globalization and galloping inequality.
3. To attempt a better understanding of the impact of globalization on the “quality” of democracy.
4. To appreciate the importance of politics and of the state.

I. Research Topics

Each seminar participant will select a research topic, and write a 20-30 page paper. The topic can be treated comparatively by country or through time within the setting of a single country. Preparation for research will involve:

- a. the definition of the problem
- b. the selection of one or more central hypotheses
- c. a justification of the problem and hypotheses by their relation to a wider body of theory
- d. the specification of the system of analysis
- e. the organization and gathering of data
- f. the writing-up and presentation of conclusions

Members of the seminar will be given the opportunity to present progress reports during the course of the semester and should raise special problems they encounter in their research for discussion.

II Core Readings

The following books must be read before the scheduled time and brought to class. Preferably they should be purchased.
